Mr. Lodge and Massachusetts.

There can be no doubt about the oratorical triumph of Senator Lodge in Boston Tuesday evening. His address was infused with profound feeling, and after hearing or reading it no one can doubt the depth of the senator's devotion to his state. Not for many long years has Boston beheld an occasion in any wise akin to this one, in which the orator, which had been so hit, terly attacked, rose in defense of the 18 years of his service in the Senate of the United States. In this one supreme effort he talked back. It would have been possible for Mr. Lodge to have abandoned on this occasion in promises of the sort that those who have led the onslaught on him have been demanding. A lesser man might have bent before the storm. But the speaker, while displaying a pleasing degree of graciousness and candor, did not forget the dignity that would not permit him to take up the role of the ready politician to whom place is more than conviction. At the same time there is no doubt that the experience through which Senator Lodge has been passing will contribute to widen his outlook and to make him responsive, within the bounds of that which he believes, to the reasonable demands of the people. He desires to be the servant of his state, but it is not to his discredit that he fails to rush headlong along the path of the so-called progressives. The spectacle in evidence throughout the country just now is rather too much that of political trimming to catch the passing wind of popular favor. In the due course of things the people will prefer the man who is not afraid. The timed honored ideal of a senator involves the ability to deliberate and to weigh public questions with calmness and intellectual honesty. It is not a bad thing when a law making body is not wholly of one mind, but contains men who differ in their views, while at one in the purpose to promote the public interest. The brake is as necessary as the whip in the long run. It must be agreed that Mr. Lodge's speech was of senatorial quality, and that the speaker has given his entire strength to the service of the commonwealth. The conclusion of the effort testifies most abundantly to this. Now it is for the legislature to approach the question of election of a senator of the United States with the honest open mindedness that seeks to give the commonwealth fit and influential representation among the senators of the nation. Is there anybody among the Republicans who have been mentioned to succeed Mr. Lodge who promises more efficient service, when all the grounds for disagreement are admitted, than the man who now holds the place?—Springfield Republican.
